Vincent J. Daly, 46, Passed As Children's Psychiatrist

Vincent J. Daly, 46, convicted of posing as a children's psychiatrist in the District in 1964, was dead on arrival Friday at D.C. General Hospital after a heart attack.

Daly began serving a term of one to three years about a year ago after he was found guilty in U.S. District Court here of misrepresenting himself as a psychiatrist and physician and dispensing dangerous drugs.

He was taken from the District correctional institution at Lorton, Va., to the hospital.

Government witnesses testified that Daly treated their children for fees ranging up to $850 at an office in the 3200 block of Connecticut Avenue NW.

Daly's lawyers took his appeal to the Supreme Court, which denied him a hearing in October. He was ordered to begin serving his term in November while a motion for a new trial was pending.

He was given a parole board hearing Nov. 25 and his case was continued.

The prosecution showed that Daly never graduated from college, although he claimed to have degrees from England's Oxford University and the University of Berne in Switzerland.

Records showed that he held jobs at state hospitals in Michigan, West Virginia and Mississippi. He served for a while as a psychologist for the Army's Psychological Warfare Board.

Daly was born in Detroit and was graduated from high school there. He was dismissed from the University of Detroit for poor scholarship after three semesters.

After resigning from his Army job in 1953, he began a private practice of psychology in North Carolina. Subsequently, he was convicted of criminal libel charges brought by a newspaperwoman in 1956.

That same year he came to Washington to set up a practice.

Services will be at 10 a.m. tomorrow at St. James Episcopal Church, 222 8th St. NE, with burial in Congressional Cemetery.
