

Edward G. Haywood

(- 27 May 1907)

Haywood. Suddenly of heart failure on Monday, May 27, 1907, Edward Graham Haywood, eldest child of Mary Manly and the late Edward C. Haywood of North Carolina. Funeral from Wright's undertaking establishment, Tuesday, May 28 (North Carolina papers please copy).

The Evening Star, May 27, 1907, p. 2

Two Men Found Dead in Bed

Illuminating Gas Thought to be Responsible

Thomas E. Gleason and Edward G. Haywood Were the Victims.

Action by Coroner

The attention of Coroner J. Ramsay Nevitt was called to two cases today in each of which illuminating gas was thought to be responsible for death. At 1113 P street northwest Mrs. Catharine Carusi found the body of Edward G. Haywood, a lodger, in bed in his room with gas flowing from a partly open jet. She declared, however, that both the window and the door were open and Haywood's death was stated to be attributable to heart disease rather than asphyxiation.

...

Until only two weeks ago Edward Haywood resided at home with his mother, 1018 6th street northeast, and he left the house in order that a younger brother who had been injured might have his bed. At the P street boarding house, it was stated this morning, Haywood remained in bed almost all day Sunday, but went out in the evening and returned about midnight. His body was still warm when Mrs. Carusi entered the room this morning. Dr. Frederic E. Macy was called. He pronounced life extinct and notified the coroner.

Employe of Pension Office

Edward G. Haywood was a son of Mrs. Mary M. and the late Edward Graham Haywood, and he was well-known in the government printing office, the Southern railway office and the pension office, in all of which places he worked at different times. He was employed as file clerk in the pension office at the time of his death. Haywood had not been in good health since he returned from Panama last September. He went to the isthmus as time clerk on the big ditch, and came back after about six months' service with a well-developed case of malaria. Quite recently he declared he was suffering from heart trouble, from which disease his father died, but no serious attention was paid to the statement and Haywood was never treated for it. Coroner Nevitt withheld his certificate of death until he could consult with Dr. Maxcy, who was the first physician to view the body.

Young Haywood was inclined to athletics, and last year he was a member of the Foundry team of the Sunday School League. His mother, one brother, John Haywood and one sister, Mrs. A. Schneider, survive him. The funeral will occur tomorrow, with interment in the Congressional cemetery.