The Late John H. Ingle

The brief notices which appeared a few days since of the death of M. John H. Ingle filled many of his friends, by its apparent suddenness, with painful surprise. To many of them his illness even was not known. Accustomed to meet him in their ordinary walks, and to observe his hale and hearty appearance, and to receive his cheerful and gentlemanly greeting, they were not prepared for the unexpected and sad announcement of his death. Something more than that brief notice of his death is due to his memory. Possessed in an eminent degree of those sterling qualities that inspire confidence, friendship, and respect, he endeared himself by his modest and gentlemanly bearing to the friends of his adoption, and was to them ever true. These qualities, cultivated and trained by education and association, he may be said in some degree to have inherited. To many now living the name of his father, the late John P. Ingle, will recall all that was good and useful in the citizen--all that was practical and pure in Christian life, and all that was upright and honorable in man. To cherish and record the virtues of the departed is the sacred duty of friendship; to preserve the example from oblivion is the grateful task of affection. Let these brief remarks serve in some degree to commemorate the virtues of the late John H. Ingle.
