Drops Dead In Theater

Lyman H. Lamb, Stage Doorkeeper, Victim of Heart Trouble

Lyman H. Lamb dropped dead last night in the Columbia Theater, where he was employed as stage doorkeeper. Funeral arrangements will be completed today.

Mr. Lamb whose home was at 480 F street southwest, suffered an attack of heart trouble shortly before 8 'clock last night while talking with a friend in the theater. The ambulance of the Emergency Hospital was called. The physician in charge pronounced him dead.

Mr. Lamb was born in Vermont, and came to Washington in 1861 and established the National pie bakery. He later retired from that business. Since the organization of the Washington baseball club of the American League, Mr. Lamb was one of the gatekeepers at the park.

Besides his wife, six children survive him.
